Outcry over Trump's words spreads wider

McCain, others in GOP assail treatment of parents of fallen soldier; candidate says election may be rigged

WASHINGTON — Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump on Monday spent a fourth day under a cascade of criticism over how he treated the family of a US soldier who died in the line of duty, the latest in a series of inflammatory episodes that have come to define his campaign.

In this instance Trump has turned his fire on perhaps the most sympathetic figures that a candidate could target: Those who've sacrificed a child to protect the country.

Trump's remarks in the past few days aimed at Khizr and Ghazala Khan, parents of Army Captain Humayun Khan, a Muslim, who was killed in Iraq in 2004, prompted a remarkable rebuke Monday from US Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona.

Trump complained Monday that he had been "viciously attacked" by the parents. He seemed to acknowledge during a rally Monday that events aren't going his way in the campaign, but blamed elites — not himself — for his bumpy campaign.

"I'm afraid the election is going to be rigged. I have to be honest," Trump said Monday afternoon.

It's a baffling tactic in his unconventional campaign, but consistent with his scorched-earth approach to winning the support of the American people. Trump has also, in recent months, praised a dictator, distributed the star of David in what was widely perceived as an anti-Semitic tweet, disparaged a federal judge, and seemingly called on Russia to launch a cyber-attack on his political opponent. (He said it was a joke.)

DRY TO THE POINT OF DISASTER

Even with more irrigation, Mass. farmers face major drought losses

SUDBURY — Along a dusty path winding through his farm fields, Chris Kurth eased a faded white Toyota pickup streaked with dirt and mud to a stop, and checked the pulse of the beat-up blue hoses keeping his crops on life support.

Despite overcast skies, the past several days of leaching sprinkles haven't been nearly enough to save Kurth and other Massachusetts farmers from the worst drought in memory. In a normal summer, Kurth gets one inch of rain every week. So far this summer, little more than an inch of rain has fallen on his Sudbury fields.

Kurth taps the forecast for the umpteenth time on a trusty iPhone worn holstered on his overalls, but sees little relief on the horizon.

"It's kind of a play it day-by-day, week-by-week game right now with cutting losses," said Kurth, owner of Siena Farms, 75 acres on a three-mile loop in Sudbury. After another day of drizzle, Kurth muses that "the rain keeps going north, west, south, everywhere but to us. . . . Maybe it's forgotten how to rain here."

For weeks, farmers such as Kurth

LAWRENCE — By day, David A. Barker and Erain Montero worked together at a Chelmsford moving company, setting up and inking down corporate offices. By night, authorities say, they ran a sophisticated theft ring, disabling alarm systems and drilling holes through walls to haul away cash and electronics from ATMs and stores across New England.

Late frenzy on Hill fit a familiar pattern

Every second counted this weekend on Beacon Hill, where lawmakers said the wall clocks in the House Chamber showed two different times, the roll-call vote printer depicted a third, and their cellphones relayed still another.

"It's sort of like 'The Three Stooges,'" said Bradley Jones Jr., the House minority leader. "Everybody's got a different clock."

Some 19 months into their session, lawmakers waited until the last minutes to enact major pieces of legislation, with little time for members to review the bills and many advocates sidelined in the final decision-making.

The Legislature's rush to finish work on bills years in the making included major policy changes that were negotiated behind closed doors with sweeping implications for the state's energy industry and ratepayers, ride-hailing companies and taxis, and community development and job training. Police, taxi industry rap Uber measure

Boston's police commissioner on Monday sharply criticized ride-hailing legislation passed by the House and Senate for not requiring drivers to be fingerprinted, while struggling taxi drivers complained the measure could force them out of business.

But Uber and Lyft praised the bill, saying it would protect the public and increase convenience by allowing their drivers to pick up passengers at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center and, with the right permits, at Logan International Airport.

Governor Charlie Baker said he was pleased the legislation had reached his desk after a frenzied late-night session
