It should not be verbose or meandering. In addition, it should be clear and easy to understand. The opening sentence is crucial in providing context for the article's content. It should be informative and concise. Subtitles should also be brief and descriptive of the article's subject matter. The article body provides the supporting evidence for the topic of discussion; it develops the theme further while giving specific details. It advances the discussion by using relevant examples, definitions, explanations, statistics (population, income, etc.), or analogies which illustrate or clarify an aspect of the subject under discussion. The article should have a concluding paragraph that summarizes the main points of the article, re-enforces the theme, and leaves the reader with a clear understanding of its subject matter. When considering style, it is important to maintain consistency throughout an article. For instance, use of correct grammar and spelling are essential to convey professionalism and credibility. Articles should be clearly written without grammatical errors or misspelled words. Additionally, avoid sentences that are too long or complicated; these detract from its readability. Sourcing is also important when discussing subject matter without bias or personal opinion. This can be done by providing footnotes with sources for all information used in the text. When referencing sources, use American style, citing the author's name and the title of the work. The most common format for a feature article, or a news story about a specific topic or action, is called an inverted pyramid. This includes a brief introduction with three main parts:

Even though most people do not edit articles they create, there are several areas in which one should be aware of when creating content. Some common violations include:

In addition to being cited by usage with tags such as [citation] [cc] [url] [web address], proper academic citations can help readers find the source material when needed. Citations are often used in developing countries to document academic research projects. They are important in academic research projects because they allow researchers access to the information which they have found, so that an informed discussion can be held.
